The Poison at the Source: The Female Novel of Self-development In The Early Twentieth Century

Penny Brown
The female aesthetic was to become another form of self-annihilation for women. Early twentieth-century novels were also anti-male, both in the sense that they convinced that life is poisoned for women, at the very source. In her serene lack of development, she was like the cello player in the joke.