A detailed history of the Ontario university system from 1945 to 1996 is presented in Diana M. Royce's thesis, "University System Coordination and Planning in Ontario, 1945 To 1996." This study examines the role and influence of organizations and institutions in the development of the Ontario university system during this period.

In 1945, Ontario's post-secondary system consisted of 14 universities with 35,000 students. By 1996, the university system had expanded, but there was a clear gap in institutional-level assessment at Ontario's universities. Not all universities made plans to grow, and some may have been active agents in making and maintaining some universities' systems of higher education. The effects of monopsony in higher education are discussed, with emphasis on policy and little cross-sector coordination.

The Council of Ontario Universities, the Association of Colleges of Ontario, and other agencies and organizations played a role in university system coordination and planning. The 1995 Higher Education Reform saw a move towards modest reform. In 1996, the Ontario Ministry of Education released the first review of university system planning and planning in Ontario. The province placed a lead role in system coordination and planning in 1996. Active agents in making and maintaining Ontario's system of higher education include several propositions that can inform the practice of strategic planning in colleges in the future.

Readings point out in his excellent excurses on the university in his 1996 study that the University System Coordination and Planning in Ontario, 1945 to 1996, had an active role in system coordination and planning. Academic work was published in 1996 by the University of Toronto Press. The effects of monopsony in higher education, the system or sectoral planning in Ontario, were discussed in the book authored by Diana M. Royce. The University System Coordination and Planning in Ontario, 1945 To 1996. was published by the University of Toronto Press.

The public university system in Ontario, as of 1996, has moved far and fast in the past decade. The effects of monopsony in higher education are discussed, with emphasis on policy and little cross-sector coordination. University System Coordination and Planning in Ontario, 1945 To 1996. was published by the University of Toronto Press.
Education, University of CSSHE:: Awards:: George L. Geis Dissertation Award The Illustrated Father Goose A Marriage Of Convenience: Business. University System Coordination And Planning In Ontario, 1945 To 1996 by Diana M. Royce. Full Title: University System Coordination And Planning In Ontario, University system coordination and planning in Ontario, 1945 to 1996 University of Toronto, The efficacy of a course management system in learning. Toronto, University system coordination and planning in Ontario: 1945 to 1996. Vol 34.3 pp 39-54.indd - Eric . Student Struggle For Mass Student Aid And The Abolition Of Tuition Fees In Ontario, University System Coordination And Planning In Ontario, 1945 To 1996